517 chiefly history books, if we can get them. Books are treasures.
212 Generally the children get them from people who are interested in us. There are students in Budapest who sometimes organise libraries on wheels. Last year this library let us have a book by Tolstoy for a week—War and Peace. We could not read the whole of it. We gathered in Uncle Andras's house, all the adult population of our cluster of huts, and we took turns reading aloud. It was winter, and we read four hours every evening, so that we had only three and a half hours' sleep. It was wonderful. We asked the students to send us a book about our history, so that we should be able to keep it. They sent it to Uncle Andras. He had to go a long way for it—to the village post office. But they did not give him the book, but told him to go to the gendarmerie. There they boxed his ears and hit his feet with sticks. "This is to teach you not to ask for books from the city, you old socialist swine." So, you see, it is quite difficult to get books.

517 Mostly we have no oil for our lamps. So we just talk. Old people talk about their grandfathers and great-grandfathers. They generally begin like this: "He was a very poor man, grandfather Janos was, rest his soul", as if it were an unusual thing to be very poor.

We talk. The young folk play around a bit; they go walking
●837 or sing for themselves. There are always a few young men about
566 who are sulking because their girl is being "used" in the manor or by someone belonging to the estate-management staff.

Because the fact is that our women-folk are "used" by our lords, estate-managers, their assistants, and even by the overseers. We belong to them, don't we? It is quite natural that if they want to use our girls they simply say, "You, Julcsa or Terka, come round this evening." And they naturally go. Some young estate assistants are nice about it and say, "Come in, Julcsa, to darn my socks"; but they generally simply tell them to come in.

The girls don't talk about this. They get some wine and sometimes a piece of bacon. Next day they are tired. But they work just the same. If they are a bit slack, the assistant rebukes them: "Do you think you can be slack just because I used you last night?" Then the girl blushes. So they work even harder next day so as not to be shamed.

566 Well, after dinner we live our private life. Let us suppose that 135 it is summer. Harvest time. The puszta is quite lively. The landworkers are here. We, the serf-servants, are not enough to do the harvest, so every spring the bailiff of our lord goes away to hire harvest gangs.

He goes to far-away places, to the east and north of the country
